THE FEDERATION CONVENTION

SIXTH DAY.
MONDAY, MARCH 9.

It was only fitting that the Convention should commence its second week's work with a full complement of members. Hitherto, though the absentees from the other colonies have one by one dropped in, Western Australia has been unrepresented. The conditions of the new-born Parliamentary life of that colony, and considerations of time and travel, prevented the Western Australian delegates from taking their places until this morning. Their absence, however, has made no very serious difference, for no important resolutions have been arrived at. The period of preminary task is not yet over, and the period of actual work has not yet begun. Therefore, Western Australia has not suffered by the enforced absence of her delegates, and they are here in ample time to take part in the debate on the resolutions proposed by Sir Henry Parkes. The representatives from the latest addition to the list of self-governing colonies received a most brotherly reception from the Convention. It was the welcome given to a new member of the family.

member certainly, but still promising, and likely to grow with remarkable rapidity. The final obstacle to a complete Australian federation has been removed by the success which has at last attended the efforts of Western Australia to obtain responsible government. This feeling, which was general throughout the Convention, was ably voiced by the President in the little address of welcome which he made on asking the delegates to sign the roll. Mr. John Forrest attended by his six colleagues, signed the roll, and then Mr. Forrest, in a few earnest words, thanked the Convention for its kindly reception, and expressed the hope that the admission of Western Australia into the group of self-governing colonies of Australia, would be to the general advantage of the other colonies.

All this preliminary business was pleasant and easy enough, and delegates seemed ready to settle down confortably to the morning's debate, when a difficulty of a rather serious nature was brought before the Convention. It was not altogether unexpected, perhaps, and as soon as Mr. Wrixon entered the Chamber, it was seen that the matter would have to be settled at once. Mr. Wrixon signed the roll, and then Victoria was placed in the curious position of having one delegate over her allotted number. This arose through Mr. Shields, the present Attorney-General of Victoria, having been appointed to the Convention by the Governor's commission during Mr. Wrixon's absence. Mr. Wrixon having returned and taken his seat, Mr. Shields became a superfluous, and, indeed, so one exactly knew whether he could be looked upon as a delegate or not. The President proposed to settle the matter by allowing Mr. Shields to take part in the Convention, without, however, having the right to vote. He suggested this course in order to avoid inconveniencing the Victorian Premier, Mr. Munro. A change of Government having taken place in Victoria, and the only one having replaced the late, Mr. Munro has been left without a legal adviser, Mr. Wrixon having been a member of the late Government. The matter might have ended here, and the President's suggestion have been carried out, had not Mr. Abbott, with a mind trained to detect and unravel points of order, taken exception to the proposed course. He raised these doubts on the validity of the proposed order.

When Mr. Shiels was appointed, and the result of this protest was Mr. Munro's remark that he felt sure Mr. Shiels would not take his seat without the unanimous voice of the delegates being in his favour. An objection having been raised, Mr. Shiels would not sit, and the Convention apparently approving of this decision, the matter dropped.

volunteer officer, impressed strongly on the Convention the need of making adequate provision for national defence. He even went so far as to suggest that a committee of delegates should be appointed to report as to the clauses which should be inserted in the new Constitution in order to secure this end. For their guidance in the matter he offered the delegates a little book of his own on the subject, which he kindly distributed gratis. There was a stir when Sir George Grey room, for a speech from the veteran statesman had been impatiently awaited for days. Sir George looked extremely well and surprisingly vigorous. He spoke slowly, in a low clear voice, which could be heard distinctly all over the Chamber. As a first essential Sir George insisted that in making a constitution it was necessary to consider the foundations first—that is, the people. No scheme of federation could be successful unless the various States composing it were satisfied; and one of the most important points was to give each State the power of framing and amending its own constitution. This could be done easily, insisted Sir George. It had been done in New Zealand, and the powers entrusted to that colony had never been abused. So that there was no reason why the Australian colonies should not adopt an elastic and easily-worked system like this. Sir George warned the Convention against stripping the Federal Government entirely of power and making the States supremely sovereign. This had been done in America, and the result had been a disastrous civil war. If the States were made too independent a time must come when the majority would disagree with the minority on some important subject. If the minority would not give way, and the Federal Government had no power to enforce its decrees, then war or disruption were inevitable. The only way out of this dilemma, the speaker thought, was to insist on a complete himself, the speaker thought, was to insert a clause in the constitution providing that any subject on which the Federal Assembly should legislate should be added to the list of powers which the States delegated to the Federation. Sir George urged this point with firmness but many members of the Convention differed strongly and expressed their dissent with audible "noes." There were suggestions of a still more startling character to come, for the venerable statesman presently surprised the Convention by asserting his belief that colonial governors should be elected by the people, and not appointed by the Crown. They might be men chosen from home or not, but it was essential to the full development of a State that the people of it should appoint their ruler. This brought Sir George to the general subject of the relations between the colonies and the mother country, and travelling rapidly over the ground, he suggested that the ties which bound us to England might be strengthened rather than weakened by the exchange. The colonies might be represented by an official in London, instead of by the Agents-General. This gentleman could conduct the business of the colonies direct with her Majesty, in the same way as is done by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the result, Sir George believed, would be most beneficial. The interest taken in the colonies by great English statesmen was much deeper than people were ready to suppose, and in support of this assertion Sir George mentioned several facts which had come under his own immediate knowledge, where young English politicians had studied the working of colonial affairs with the greatest care. Then Sir George, leaving details on one side, became more enthusiastic as he touched upon his favourite topic of a federation of the English-speaking races all over the world. In impassioned periods he urged that all the English-speaking people should be united in a single political system.

people, no matter what their form of religion or government, should unite hand in hand for the welfare of the race. They might even make the commencement of it here, by admitting all English-speaking people into the federation. It did not matter what the form of Government was, whether Republican or Monarchical, all the nations of our own race should be admitted to the federation, and we should debate together the matters which concerned the welfare of the race. Looking at everything from a broad-minded liberal point of view, Sir George appealed for liberty in its fullest sense for all the people of Australia. A member had remarked that the delegates were legislating for the future, but the saying, as Sir George put it, had a much wider and broader meaning. They ought, he said, to legislate in such a way as to enable the future to legislate for itself. On the matter of self-defence, Sir George recommended the formation of a huge standing army on the Continental lines, and asked that every citizen should be free to act as he chose, and not compelled to go out and get slaughtered whenever his rulers chose to command. Then, with a full measure of self-government, a nation would spring up whose prosperity and happiness would be of a kind hitherto unknown. This hopeful assertion brought Sir George's interesting speech to an end, and he sat down amid a hearty round of applause.

Mr. Rutledge, of Queensland, excited some amusement by drawing an analogy from the relations which ordinarily exist between husband and wife. Mr. Rutledge, in contrast with Mr. Deakin, favours the maintenance of State rights through a powerful Senate. The Lower House, or Congress, was, according to Mr. Rutledge, the husband, whilst the wife, who possessed the power of veto, was the Upper House. And inasmuch as any man of well-regulated mind, desirous of submit all his money matters to his wife, so should the Congress representing the people consult with the Senate representing the States ; which could exercise, if need be, the power of veto. There were weak points about this analogy, and one of them was found out by Sir Thomas M. Gurnith, who mischievously suggested that, in the family, the wife usually possessed the power of veto.

judiciary he hoped that we should never sever the link which bound us to the throne of England by making the Sovereignty of that country the fountain of justice. He sincerely trusted that no change would be made in that which he had not any complaint of, and which he thought commercial men in the country would reasonably object to. If the alteration was effected without the means of supplying capital from foreign into the country. He would conclude by saying that he trusted the labours of the Convention would be successful. They had now an opportunity of gathering together the scattered elements of this continent, and of improving the condition of the people by placing them under one Constitution to enjoy all those blessings which, by their efforts, they were trying to consolidate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DIRBS moved the adjournment of the debate. The motion was agreed to.

the people of Australia, will always be in a minority, and the smaller States in a majority of more than two to one. In this view of the proposals it seems strange to find orators so carried away by their generosity as to plead against a "form of government which would place the weaker States at the mercy of the stronger States." As a safeguard against this peril what is suggested is to deliver over the stronger States
